GENERAL OVERVIEW

Nowadays, due largely to the process of global warming, the Arctic region has gained great strategic and economic relevance. From the strategic point of view, it is a region located in the territory of the traditional super powers, which raises the issue of its possible militarization. From the economic point of view, it is a region where important natural resources abound, and the ongoing Arctic meltdown has made possible the opening of new routes to global trade. Territorial disputes in the Arctic are few, the issue of sovereignty claims of the several States bordering the Arctic Ocean, raises issues centered on the delimitation of maritime spaces under the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS, 1982), especially in connection with their respective continental shelves beyond two hundreds nautical miles. With the progressive melting of the ice, new trade routes - Northwest Passage and Northeast Passage - are opening up, making exploitation of natural resources easier. In addition, indigenous communities are affected not only by climate change, but also by the political game of great powers struggling to take control over their natural habitats. The Arctic also faces environmental hazards connected with oil spills, fishing, and mining. These threats enhance the need to delineate and defend the Arctic region and the national borders therein, to establish surveillance of trade routes, and to ensure proper exploitation of natural resources and protection of the inhabitants. In sum, this region is a first magnitude geostrategic fulcrum in which the interests of the international community converge. The same can be said of those of the national sovereignties of neighboring nations, which seek to control the region and its vast resources.

MAIN OBJECTIVES

The Symposium aims at creating an interdisciplinary space of discussion and debate among different Arctic scientists, policy makers and stakeholders. Including academics and representatives of both Arctic and non-Arctic research Institutes, the congress will give a general overview of the most relevant issues related with the North-Pole region and derived from climate change. It must be noticed, considering that Spain is developing its first Polar Strategy, that this is the first Spanish Symposium on Arctic issues from the perspective of Human and Social Sciences, particularly, International Law and Political Science. The Congress not only intends to be a forum for scientific discussion, but also a way to make known among students of the main challenges present in the Arctic.
